PALLADIUM MYTHS

- Palladium Myth-Palladium can't be cast; Traditional 950 Palladium/50 Ruthenium alloys are indeed difficult to cast. These alloys have an insatiable appetite for oxygen and hydrogen which produces severe porosity. How? As gas dissolves into the melt it forms gas bubbles which later escape when the metal solidifies — leaving pinholes on the surface and voids inside. Unless you have expensive vacuum casting equipment, you cannot defeat the likelihood of porosity using traditional alloys. Hoover and Strong TruPd™ was developed to inhibit the amount of gas that dissolves and thus allow investment casters to achieve success with palladium.

(Tip: An argon gas cover is recommended when melting palladium.)

- Palladium Myth-Palladium can't be soldered; there was some truth to this complaint with early solders. But this is no longer the case. We have developed easy, medium and hard palladium solders for small jobs. Our 20k white hard solder is recommended and was developed for seamless soldering when sizing rings.

- Palladium Myth-Palladium is much grayer than platinum; this observation is often true for 14k and 18k white gold. Palladium white gold has high grayness because it is being used to mask yellow in gold. But pure 950 palladium used as an alloy is much whiter than palladium white gold. Indeed, when asked to distinguish pure palladium from pure platinum pieces, consumers often say the two look identical.

- Palladium Myth-Palladium is the “poor man’s platinum.”; Saving the best myth for last, whenever someone tells us that palladium is an inexpensive alternative to platinum, we remind them that palladium is rarer than gold and a member in full standing of the platinum family. Like platinum, it offers higher purity and whiter color than white gold. Last, it is nickel free and hypo-allergenic, needs no transitory rhodium plating to give it the final color, and can be cast and soldered. If anything, it's the only answer to the dilemma of white gold for those who can only afford gold. So it would be more accurate to call palladium the “rich man’s white gold.”

THE PALLADIUM STORY

Palladium's Growing Popularity

The explosive growth in popularity of white metals over the last decade (particularly white gold and silver) creates a unique opportunity for palladium jewelry. Palladium offers a more radiant white than white gold, as well as many of the desired characteristics of platinum without platinum's price; which has had a precipitous decrease in U.S. platinum sales as it exceeds $1,800. This trend is strongest among the new generation of fine jewelry consumers. 73% of 18 – 24 year old adults prefer white jewelry compared to 40% in the 25+ group. Currently, palladium has stabilized around $700/oz at this printing, making it irresistible even to white gold jewelry buyers. Palladium and platinum are interchangeable in many applications as they are both noble metals with similar characteristics and usually derived from the same mines. Both share the lustrous beauty, strength and durability that have been the hallmarks of this metal class.
